The sea urchin embryo consists of a series of linked, completely organized, sequentially-formed blastomeres. Each blastomere is composed of a dynamic, undifferentiated population of cells. The blastomeres undergo a series of intercalating transformations which transform them from a totipotent state to a unipotent state, and finally to an undifferentiated state. This review will focus on the role of the gastrulation organizer, a widely recognized, histologically distinct, and temporally invariant tissue in the early sea urchin embryo. It will address the role of the organizer in the process of chorion formation, as well as the factors that are released by the organizer. In particular, attention will be directed towards those molecules that are released by this tissue that function to repress the formation of endoderm and mesoderm, or to positively induce or repress the formation of ectoderm. The molecules that have been implicated in this regulation will be discussed in the context of a hypothetical model for the mechanism of chorion formation, as well as the various lines of evidence that support this model.About AfrikaBurn AfrikaBurn On July 10th 2013, players from all over the world will gather in the Namibian desert to compete in the fourth edition of the summer hit event on the world famous Skeleton Coast of Namibia. Stubby the Stuffer: Stuffed Angry Bionic Beasts PROS While not terribly original, Stubby the Stuffer is a fun collection of puzzles that will keep you guessing. CONS After a lengthy intro, the gameplay falls back on "let's see if you can guess how to solve this puzzle". VERDICT The puzzles are simple and ingenious but they are less of a gaming experience than Stubby the Stuffer's brief intro promises.
